PART I: ACCESS TO INFORMATION FROM WRITTEN TEXTS (70 points)

Read the article below and then answer questions 1-8.

LEARNING AT A DISTANCE

There's no question that the quickest way to learn to speak a foreign language is to spend time in a country where that language is spoken. But if you can't manage a trip abroad the next best thing may be the Internet. There you can find new websites that put you in touch with a native speaker who will help you practice your conversational skills in the comfort of your home.

Using these sites, tutors and learners – who may be thousands of miles apart – communicate online, talking and typing simultaneously. Most of the websites are free, since members simply tutor each other. A Frenchman in Paris trying to learn Italian, for instance, can converse with a native speaker in Rome and receive feedback on his grammar and choice of vocabulary. His Italian study partner can benefit from the arrangement in the same way.

"We've found that it's the convenience and informality of these members-teach-members sites that make them so appealing," says Michael Stewart, head of the Washington Language Center, "as well as the fact that there are thousands of study partners to choose from." These features may account for the rapid growth in the number of people using the websites. The largest, ConversiLines, already has 200,000 members after only twelve months in operation.

The sites are ideal for people who want to brush up their high-school Spanish before a vacation, or to master useful phrases in Chinese to impress colleagues in Shanghai. Pamela Geller, for example, a Canadian banker who frequently travels to China on business, studied Chinese off and on for six years before she discovered ConversiLines. She claims that since she began working with her Chinese study partners, she has learned as much as she did in all the previous years of study combined. "Part of the reason I've made so much progress is that I can go online whenever I have free time," she says. "And while I still don't conduct negotiations in Chinese, now I can chat with my hosts in their own language, and that's much more than I could do before."
